

"Be careful that you don't fall into the KM traps of yesterday. In the past, companies made Knowledge Management a project. They would buy an expensive system, then assign a team to build content. Their job was to rake knowledge from the brains of experienced employees, making them feel vulnerable and abused. The best employees kept their unique knowledge to themselves, protecting it as though they were protecting their job."